Lung cancer remains the most common cause of cancer death in the USA and worldwide. In spite of decades of research and the development of a number of cytotoxic chemotherapies for lung cancer, the survival rates for this disease remain low, and new therapies are desperately needed. The studies described herein are based upon the premise that lung cancer is the product of molecular alterations, and that the development of these alterations is regulated by evolutionarily-conserved cell-signaling pathways. Recent studies have shown that the p75NTR is a member of the tumor necrosis factor (TNF) receptor superfamily and that ligands for this receptor are frequently expressed in lung cancer and associated with poor prognosis. Preliminary data presented herein indicates that the p75NTR plays a role in the biology of lung cancer cells, and that p75NTR signaling is altered in the formation and development of these tumors. Further studies have revealed that the p75NTR is a prognostic factor for lung cancer. The central hypothesis of this proposal is that the p75NTR may represent a molecular target for the treatment of lung cancer, and that the molecular mechanisms of p75NTR signaling and their regulation are likely to be the same as those of
